We are all working through SIGMA implementation and it is important to remember the purpose of such a collaboration.

We collaborate in order to create something greater than we can create alone. Not because of any deficiency or incompleteness in us, but because each of us is unique, with our own talents and abilities, and in collaboration we increase the efforts and talents available for creating something meaningful together. All collaborations, whether creative, or professionally-based can be powerful relationships for personal growth. In collaboration we harness the power of a team.

It is important to choose our collaborations carefully and aligned with our values. Sometimes forged quickly during times of need, we may find ourselves rushing into partnerships with perhaps not the clearest intentions. If we can stay clear about what we want and what we need in a collaboration, while staying grounded and remembering that we are our own source of happiness and fulfillment, we can create collaborations that support and enhance the best of who we are.

STATE CIOs WANT FEDERAL AGENCIES TO GET OUT OF THEIR WAY

Mitch Herckis, Route Fifty Senior Director of Programs

NASCIO's advocacy priorities cite duplicative and conflicting security regulations and audits a waste of time and money.

The National Association of State Chief Information Officers released its 2018 federal advocacy priorities on Thursday. In a nutshell? Let state governments innovate, optimize, save money and serve their state's residents without significant federal burdens—and let's be sure to share information efficiently and effectively along the way.

Chief among their priorities is reducing the federal burden of conflicting security regulations from various federal agencies and programs.

In releasing the organization's 2018 priorities, NASCIO President and Oklahoma CIO Bo Reese said: "State CIOs continue to seek efficiencies within state government through efforts like IT consolidation/optimization, which for my state has reaped over $351 million in savings and IT cost avoidance. However, voluminous and conflicting federal cybersecurity regulations often pose a challenge in our ability to do so and it is our hope that our federal partners will work with state CIOs to harmonize regulations and normalize the audit process."

Reese should know. Last year alone, Oklahoma faced thirteen federal audits, creating a heavy burden on his state. According to NASCIO's factsheet on the issue, one state reported receiving five different outcomes from federal auditors who reviewed the same IT environment, while another state reported spending 4,000 hours responding to one federal audit.

"It would be good if we could do it one time—or at least less than 13," Yejin Cooke, NASCIO's director of government affairs, told Route Fifty in an interview.

NASCIO began working with the administration last year regarding harmonizing cybersecurity regulations that they claim are often redundant or conflicting across multiple agencies. The organization held meetings with White House Cybersecurity Coordinator Rob Joyce and members of the Office of the Federal Chief Information Officer, among others.

In June, Reese testified before the U.S. House Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee on the issue, stating in his testimony that compliance with federal data security regulations remained one of the "biggest hurdles" to IT consolidation in his state, explaining, "State CIOs invest an inordinate amount of time identifying duplicative regulatory mandates or their differences, participating in federal audits, and responding to inconsistent audit findings. These challenges in and of themselves are not unmanageable; the real issue is that they can and have impeded efforts of state CIOs to introduce efficiencies and generate savings for taxpayers."

Respecting State Authority on Emerging Technology

Beyond security regulations, NASCIO is also asking Congress and the administration not to limit states' authority to allow experimentation with emerging technology.

COMING SOON TO SOLITARY CONFINEMENT CELLS: NATURE VIDEOS

Natalie Delgadillo | January 18, 2018

Inmates held in solitary confinement live up to 23 hours of each day in a tiny cell with limited contact with other humans. The practice has been found to lead to adverse behavioral effects in inmates, including anxiety, depression, hopelessness and violent outbursts.

Most prisoners in solitary lack access to fresh air and natural light. But according to a recent study, those things can be simulated to improve their behavior and well-being.

A study published in the journal Frontiers in Ecology and Environment in September found that inmates who were shown nature videos for 45 minutes up to five times a week exhibited a 26 percent reduction in discipline referrals. Nearly half of the inmates reported improved moods that lasted for several hours after watching the videos, and 80 percent of them said the videos made their time in solitary easier to bear.

The study was carried out at the Snake River Correctional Institution in Oregon, a maximum security facility where inmates in solitary confinement are only let out of their cells to exercise in an indoor room once a day for about 45 minutes. Snake River reached out to the study's author, Nalini Nadkarni, after seeing her TED Talk on bringing nature and science into prisons, says co-author Tierney Thys, a research associate at the Cal Academy of Sciences.

"Both Nalini and I, our motto is put nature where it's not," Thys says. "My background is as a filmmaker [for National Geographic] and a marine biologist. I've seen that time in nature has a therapeutic aspect that is underappreciated."

Researchers gave 24 male inmates the option to view nature videos during their time in the indoor exercise room (later nicknamed the "Blue Room" for the blue glow of the projected videos). They displayed images of oceans, forests, rivers, deserts and rain. Some of the videos had ambient noise, some were accompanied by music, and some were silent. Twenty-four other male inmates did not get the same option.

The study points to the possibility that exposure to nature in an artificial sense can play a part in reducing psychological stress for nature-deprived people. It builds on research conducted in 1984 by Roger Ulrich, who showed that people healing from gallbladder surgeries needed less pain medication and healed better when their bedside window had a view of trees.

For some experts on solitary confinement, the findings aren't surprising.

"The idea that [nature videos] would be helpful makes real sense to me," says Stuart Grassian, a psychiatrist who has conducted extensive research on the psychological effects of solitary confinement. "In any situation of restricted environmental stimulation, any enhancement becomes important and helpful, if it involves the anchoring of attention."

In other words, he says taking solitary prisoners' minds off of their current situation is beneficial.

KNOWING YOUR AUDIENCE: WHY THE LEARNING CURVE BENDS BOTH WAYS

In addition to my full-time job with a large government employer, I teach part-time in a college program for university graduates who want to get into public service. I've been doing this for a long time – since 2002 – and have discovered something interesting.

As much as I think of myself as their teacher, I am also – in some respects – their student. That is to say, over the years, I've come to see that in some important ways, I have as much to learn from them as I hope they do from me.

The students I teach are in their early 20's, for the most part. That puts them pretty squarely in the much discussed millennial camp (although, apparently, not for that much longer). I spend a great deal of time coaching and mentoring them through the earliest stages of their career trajectories.

As I've conducted my own job search over the past four or five years, I've been thinking more and more about how they go about it. And while I'm loath to generalize, I do think they offer some helpful pointers. For example:

Stay current. In today's workplace, that means embracing all that is digital. Knowing your productivity suite (such as the software you use to create and manage your documents) is a good start, not a goal in and of itself.

Get with the diversity program. When I first started teaching, my course had a unit on diversity. I quickly realized that many millennials, especially in larger communities, live the reality of diversity every single day. To them, it's a fact of life. Real, meaningful diversity isn't just about counting heads or affirmative action outcomes (although those metrics are important); it's about recognizing that voices that aren't normally heard – whether it's because they're new, or they speak with a heavy accent, or they lack your experience and mine – might still have something valuable to say. It's about recognizing people as people, and not labeling them or allowing those labels to hinder their value. That process can be messy. The alternative is worse.

Manage your work-life balance. Some workplaces still restrict or outright ban access to social media. Leaving aside the ways that limits our effectiveness as employees, it represents an extra challenge for millennials, who are also known as digital natives for good reason. They tend to treat social media as a quick mental break from brain work that can be extremely taxing. As one of my favorite thinkers on this topic has said, there's no difference between someone who spends five minutes an hour on Facebook and someone who goes outside five times a day for a cigarette. And on a related note...

Work itself can be dynamic, and that's ok. Many of us boomers were raised in an era when we expected to have one job for life, and to work there for as long as humanly possible. The millennials I know have a totally different relationship with the workplace; they not only expect to move around, they see it as inevitable, at least in the beginning. Which is not to say they don't covet permanence and security; see my last post for more.

As I suggested at the outset, each group has something to learn from the other. For example, many peers of my snack bracket talk in frequently disparaging terms about the "sense of entitlement" they perceive in their younger colleagues. My view is different. After working with them directly for 15 years, I see their behavior as more developmental than generational.

When I graduated in the mid-1980s, North America was in the midst of a long, slow economic decline, not unlike what many areas are experiencing now. I can distinctly remember thinking that the generation before mine had ruined things for us – made housing unaffordable, taken (and kept) all the best jobs, poisoned the environment, and so on. Sound familiar?

On the flip side, I find myself having to remind my students that the people they're attempting to contact for work are most likely older than they are themselves. That means they have to adjust their approach accordingly.

Sometimes, they will get frustrated when a prospective employer (or information interview subject) doesn't respond quickly enough to an email. I remind them that people of my age group might prefer a phone call. Of course, the telephone isn't the only tool available to them. Neither, however, should it be neglected.

The bottom line, for me, is that the golden rule of communications also applies in these situations: know your audience.

FOUR WAYS TO GO FROM MANAGER TO LEADER

By: Ashley Stahl, Contributor, Forbes.com

Perhaps you're in a leadership role but don't feel like you've earned the respect from your team. Maybe you feel like they don't even like you. As a career coach to millennials, I've had plenty of new managers come to me, desperate to win approval from their team. It's a classic case of manager versus leader: they are managing their team effectively, but they aren't leading them. So what separates a manager from a leader, and why does it matter?

A manager knows how to execute. He follows the rules and does everything right. He effectively delegates work, manages timelines, and meets deadlines. A manager can be counted on to get it done. Managers are a necessary part of any organization, but leaders will take things to the next level.

A leader has a vision and knows how to inspire a team to go above and beyond. A leader uses emotional intelligence to draw the best out of each teammate and empower them. Research shows that teams managed by motivators (aka leaders) perform better than those that are too heavily controlled by a designated supervisor (aka managers). In short, managers control while leaders grow.

Here are four practical steps you can take now to elevate yourself from a manager to a leader.

1. Leaders Leave Their Egos At The Door: A true leader does whatever is required to get the job done. If that means running the copier, making the midnight coffee run, or assembling folders, that's what the leader does, even if his paycheck and title suggest otherwise. This approach not only guarantees that the work gets done; it also does wonders for the energy levels on the team.

One way to implement this is to pay attention to the unique brilliance of each employee on your team. If you see that people are exceptionally good at something, offer to take some work off their plate so you can free them up to make better use of their skill set. If you're coming up blank on ideas for them, ask them what they'd like to do more of. They will respect you for getting your hands dirty, and they'll appreciate you for making them feel seen and heard.

2. Leaders Know How To Listen: Leaders listen to everyone, even those who might not have as much "experience" as other people in the room. The best leaders treat brainstorming as a democracy of ideas. They ask "what do you think?" and get everyone involved.

One way of getting more invested participation from your employees is to introduce a weekly team meeting where new ideas are solicited from each person. This is a great way to strengthen the team mentality, showing your employees that you want and welcome their brilliance.

3. Leaders Have Emotional Fitness: Emotional intelligence—the ability to read and connect with just about anyone in the room—is great, but it doesn't sustain you in times of uncertainty and instability. It wasn't until I became a career coach that I learned the importance of emotional fitness. Emotional fitness is your ability to flexibly endure the ups and downs of business and life. The difference between managers and leaders is the way they react to and process the failed deals, the lost clients, and even the busted refrigerator in the break room. Managers freak out, sending tiny ripples of panic and chaos through the rest of the team. Leaders tap into an inner Buddha, an unwavering stillness that empowers them to take a deep breath and keep moving forward.

4. Leaders Live Outside Their Comfort Zone: Playing a big game doesn't always feel natural or comfortable, but it's a choice that true leaders make again and again. As kids, we are often conditioned to go with the grain and to avoid disrupting our environment. We often keep ourselves from really being seen, and from being different. The problem here is that this encourages us to grow into very average adults who only feel comfortable when we're playing small.

I'll never forget the moment I stepped backstage at TEDxBerkeley. As the least seasoned speaker at the time, I thought I'd definitely be the most nervous in the room....The entire group backstage was panicked. Nothing this rewarding can possibly exist in your comfort zone, and it's the leaders who are willing to wake up daily, stepping outside of theirs.

Leadership is part art, part science. A leader, like any manager, knows how to make things happen, but it's often the leader who comes up with the ideas or inspires their team to innovate in the first place. If you're truly ready to step into a leadership role, it's time to go above and beyond what is required, and empower your team to do the same.

In the end, leadership is a choice. And the choice is yours.

The Mark of Excellence in Federal, State, and Local Government

CGFM is the professional certification recognizing the unique skills and special knowledge required of today's government financial managers. It covers governmental accounting, auditing, financial reporting, internal controls, and budgeting at the federal, state, and local levels.

CPE Topics and Subjects that Qualify

The CGFM is initially responsible for determining whether a topic or subject qualifies as acceptable CPE. CPE programs include a wide variety of topics and subjects that may contribute to maintaining or enhancing the professional proficiency of some CGFMs, but not others. Determining what topics and subjects are appropriate for individual CGFMs to satisfy the CPE requirement is a matter of professional judgment. Among the considerations in exercising that judgment are CGFM's experience, the government financial management area(s) in which they work and the responsibilities they assume in performing government financial management functions.

To help one determine whether the course would qualify for CPE, the CGFM should answer "yes" to all of the following questions:

1. Is the information covered in this course applicable to government financial management?
2. Does this course contribute to my professional proficiency as a CGFM?
3. Does this course provide information that directly benefits me in my job as a government financial manager or enhance my overall knowledge of government financial management?

Some courses, such as the ones that cover individual or business taxation, may not qualify for the CGFM CPE. If the CGFMs are taking these courses to satisfy the CGFM requirement, they will need to make a connection to their job and proficiency as a government financial manager and be prepared to provide a written explanation of the applicability of such courses.

CPE that would satisfy the CGFM Program's requirement must be in government financial management topics or related technical subjects applicable to government financial management. Examples of such topics and subjects include, but are not limited to, the following:

“A premature regulatory framework could stifle innovation and introduce unintended consequences. As such, NASCIO supports the ability and authority of state governments to continue to serve as laboratories of democracy as it applies to emerging technology,” according to NASCIO’s fact sheet.

NASCIO’s plan to advocate for state authorities in the area of emerging technology dovetails with the actions of other national organizations representing state and local government interests. For instance, in the fall, state and local organizations sent a flurry of letters and advocacy campaigns focused on congressional efforts to outline federal and state roles in autonomous vehicle technologies. Nevada Gov. Brian Sandoval, who currently serves as chairman of the National Governors Association, also touted the role of states as innovators during the organization’s “State of the States” address last week.

“Governors are truly the nation’s chief innovators, fostering new technologies, creating new opportunities and laying the foundation for an innovative future,” Sandoval said in his remarks.

State CIOs, who play a key role in consulting with their governor and state agencies on applications of emerging technologies, want to be part of that discussion. “State CIOs recognize the need to address emerging technology by design rather than default and are embracing their role in these discussions,” NASCIO Executive Director Doug Robinson said in a statement.

"I haven't read the study and I don't want to comment endorsing it or not, but I'm very skeptical about whether something so modest would be effective at overcoming negative psychological effects that are so serious," Haney says. "Whether people's mood improves is a separate question from [that] of whether they're suffering from how they're being treated. The real question ought to be why are people being confined in an environment where they have no opportunity to be in real nature?"

To Haney's point, states are slowly reducing the use of solitary confinement. Colorado ended the practice for inmates with mental health issues. Courts in Massachusetts and Pennsylvania have limited the practice. New York's changes, reached as part of a class-action settlement, include exemptions for pregnant prisoners and requirements that inmates in solitary have access to mental health treatment. Some say they could serve as a national model.

Since the study was released, the authors have been approached by a few state and local corrections facilities that want to bring the practice to their prisons.

For its part, the Oregon Department of Corrections has expanded the Blue Room principle to other facilities. Staff created a nature channel at the women's maximum For its part, the Oregon Department of Corrections has expanded the Blue Room principle to other facilities. Staff created a nature channel at the women's maximum security institution that's available on every inmate's private television 24 hours a day, says Chad Naugle, sustainability programs manager at the Oregon Department of Corrections. The channel has also been set up on the communal TVs at the minimum security facility.

Most recently, the women's prison has designated a "crisis unit" cell that acts as a Blue Room, where inmates in psychological distress can enter to relax and soothe themselves.

"We're trying to find something for the female inmates because they have higher rates of self-harm," says Naugle. "Anything we can do to eliminate those costs and staff overtime is sustainable for the institution, and it's also a safety thing. I am [also] hoping for an increased sense of well-being generally."
